

About Relationships

If it were not for relationships, we would not have much of a music industry, especially country and western.

I believe that during the Age of Reason (Yang or male dominant energy) we have shifted from situational relationships to relations as a result of situations, or relationships causing situations.

Take a moment to think about that statement before reading further. What is the difference between a situational relationship and a relationship as a result of a situation?

Quite a bit.

A situational relationship is one that exists by virtue of some event or energetic transaction that is current and In the Now (to use a popular phrase).

A relationship as a result of a situation is one that exists by virtue of some event or energetic exchange that happened in the past.

As for relationships causing situations, I suspect that anyone reading this essay is well aware of these. These are relationships that have passed their expiry date and are smelling up the fridge. They might also be current relationships but “out of context”.

In the last three paragraphs I have introduced concepts of time and space. These concepts are not normally associated with relationships. However, they are very much part of relationships.

A problem of our recent epoch is that relationships were set apart from the nature of Relationship to fit into a tighter compartment consistent with left brain thinking. Relationships that are Relative are not compatible with the orderly requirements of science and reason. They are, however, compatible with the precepts of The Age of Feeling (Yin or Feminine).

What is a relationship?

A relationship is any energetic exchange between two or more people. The level and type of exchange is not a determinant, only the fact that there has been, or is, an exchange is relevant.

Under this definition relationships are part of:

families
dating work associations
outings
chance meetings
