

The End of The World

Religions and cults, from Hopi to Mayans; from Christian and to Pagan profess to a cataclysmic end of the world as we know it some time around 2012.

While all of the prophecies are adamant about an end of what we know, they are somewhat vague about what will arrive in the vacuum created by such a cessation of “life as we know it.” This vagueness tends to leave one somewhat discomfited and understandably nervous. Depending upon outlook and context, the range of possible negative outcomes during 2012 is really quite remarkable and undeniably bleak.

I have a different perspective, more in line with an energetic view of the world. Ages ebb and flow, not unlike the tides, however with much longer periods that we can normally comprehend. Swings that run thousands of years are hard to grab hold of, hard to sort, and even harder to observe.

Very early humans were primarily earth mother/goddess oriented. For thousands of years women were the elemental mystics, and holders of religious mysteries. Starting about 5 thousands years ago male influences became more pronounced, shifting metaphysical experiences from feeling to explanatory and logical, ending in our current period of science and logic. The ascendancy of Greek civilization was a nexus from which the Age of Reason rose. Conversely the Age of the Feminine and Mystical ebbed.

During the time of early female dominance the veil between the known and the unknown was fairly transparent. The age of reason created enormous barriers barring the personalization of the mystical.

Experiences with after life, angels, spirits, extra terrestrials have been rigorously suppressed and sublimated, resulting in its extreme expression of burning or torturing women who had or expressed any metaphysical skills or power at all.

During this period we lost our ability to feel, to sense, and to know love in its most elemental form. Shame, guilt, perversion, introversion and control - being of the world - became more important than being in the world or Being. These control concepts formed the basis of many of the world’s dominant religions. It is no co-incidence that these religions were managed and run by men.

Looking around today, I see many examples of changes in this perspective. Television and other entertainment media have increasing amounts of metaphysical content, more often than not with female leads or protagonists. Women are finding their way into many of the main line religions as clerics or contributors of changes in how religion is seen and experienced.

Women of Power, that is women who have and use special talents are more visible and successfully aiding humanity throughout the traditional secular and logical western world. In other cultures they are emerging and practicing long cherished rites and ceremonies, as well as using earth magic to heal and aid their people.

More and more frequently people experience paranormal events. Recent polls indicate that more than 55% of adult Americans believe that they have had a contact or experience with something that is not from this 3 dimensional world. As one psychic I deeply respect has stated, the veil is weakening.

What does this mean in terms of apocalyptic prophesies?

Everything. I believe that what we will experience is the reduction of the age of reason and the ascension of the age of feeling. This is the rise and re-entry of the feminine into the harsh world of the male we now experience.

The form and style of our work, our way of relating to it, is collapsing. It is essential and vital that women, the traditional keepers of faith, step forward in a constructive and healing way as the feminine begins its inevitable surge into our lives. They must help prevent the male from being completely overwhelmed by the power of the sensory, bringing a balance between both sides of humanity and the universe, a time which has never before existed since the first knowing pulses of creation.

To achieve this dynamic and critical objective women must be more than just an expression of the feminine. They must transcend themselves, embracing all aspects of the expression of life, using their intimate powers to counter but not submerge the masculine in the world.

Women of Power have a further responsibility. It is to develop and encourage men to find and embrace their intuitive/emotive/feminine aspects without sublimating or perverting their masculinity.

This is an enormous undertaking, one that requires skill, dedication and no doubt, sacrifice as well power.

I am certain that this is what the breaking of the world is about. I have no doubt that the talent and resolve exists in women today, both individually and as a collective.

A world of Unity, in which yin and yang are balanced, will be a new world. The world we know now will have ended. It will be an exciting time, one in which humanity will have the opportunity, the means and the will to reach into the other realms while remaining well founded in the earth. Life, as we know it, will transform.
